Sunday

Smallville I be big

By MICHAEL GILTZ

HEN actor Tom Welling found out he'd won the part of Superman as a teenager the new WB series "Smallin the new WB series Sman ville" — a role that could transform him from a mild mannered 24 year old actor into a major star — he was in exactly the right spot: a phone booth.

OK, there aren't actually any real phone booths left in LA. But he was on the side of the road with a phone in his hand.

"I went to the final screen test between me and another fellow," he remembers. "I was on my way back from the Warner Bros. studio and I stopped in a gas sta-tion to call my manager and tell him how it went. I called and get him on the phone and he said nim now it went. I called and get him on the phone and he said, 'Can you hold on a second? I'm like, well, alright. I'm thinking, Thanks for the priority. Next thing I know, there are literally seven people on the other line and almost in unison they say, 'Tom, you got it?'

"Tom, you got ift"

Calling from the set in Vancouver, Welling is bracing for the onslaught of attention that "Smallville" will bring him when it debuts Oct. 16 on the WB. (It has one of the toughest slots in television, facing off against "Frasier" and the new hit "Scrubs" on NBC; the cult favor-ite "Roswell" on UPN; and *24," the most talked-about show of the season on Fox.)

Welling, who was born in up-state New York and spent years in Michigan, Wisconsin and Del-

Want to play Superman? Then you'd better be able to carry the weight aware, has every reason to exect the show will change his ife. His biggest previous success came on a three episode arc of "Judging Amy" that was ex-panded to six. He also had a brief appearance as a frat boy in the pilot for Fox's "Undeclared."

He may be a relative unknown, ut the character of Superman has unfailingly brought its stars fame. Superman has succeeded as a comic book, a newspaper serial, a radio show, a matinee serial at the movies, the memorable '50s TV show starring George Reeves, the smash films George Reeves, the smash rims with Christopher Reeves, the romantic comedy "Lois & Clark" that ran for four years on ABC.
The only truly forgetable Man of Steel was a little-remembered syndie show "Superboy" that ran for three years in the late '80s and had a college-age Clark Kent battling vampires and other par-battling vampires and other par-anormal things.

161146

As everyone has made clear, this Clark Kent is just a teenager with super powers that make him feel awkward and alone — just like most teens. "No tights: no flights," is their motto.

no flights" is their motto.

Welling, who has been happily tackling it hour days on the set and isn't even sure which epi-sode they're on, likes that. He tried to fit in during school by switching from acting to sports like soccer and baseball. But Welling loves that Clark isn't a goody-goody hero yet. He might even be rebellious ... and a rebellious teen with super powers is something to behold.

"Clark is one of the kids," ex-plains Welling. "He has a lot of friends, but he's not necessarily the most popular because he feels the powers that he does have alienate him from being a real kid. He's trying to come to grips with what that means. They've made him less geeky, less sources.

"Clark's not always going to be the nice guy; he won't always do the right thing. He's a teenage kid trying to grasp the con-cept of these abilities and what he's here for and how did he get here and where is he going. There's going to be anger and vengeance and violence. We all know how he turns out; this is the journey of how he gets there.